Trissential Improves Projecy[®] Project Selection Software — An Important Upgrade for Recession Stressed Organizations

Minneapolis – March 10, 2009 – Trissential, a business improvement and project implementation company, has upgraded Projecy[®] project selection and prioritization software — giving governance executives and business architects a more customizable tool for the selection and management of business-improvement initiatives.

“The recession has created a condition to which senior management must quickly and effectively re-evaluate the organization’s portfolio of business improvement projects,” said Michael Vinje, Trissential principal and cofounder. “This new version of Projecy does just that. The software adjusts more easily to changing improvement needs and can be customized to the organization’s unique planning processes.”

The Projecty Selection tool is designed to aid governance executives and business architects in the identification, categorization, evaluation, prioritization, balance, and authorization of improvement initiatives. The tool also helps managers review and report on initiatives and gives managers the ability to monitor and rapidly identify potentially significant implementation problems.

In addition to being far more customizable, the new version of Projecty is also Microsoft .Net compliant for application throughout the enterprise. Projecty software is made available to all Trissential clients who are engaged in initiative prioritization and portfolio and project management. Others interested in this tool should contact Trissential for a consultation.

Trissential consultants assist organizations in linking strategy to efficient management and exceptional execution of business improvement initiatives — the three elements of the Essential™ Business Model for improving bottom-line results. Trissential believes that its ultimate value is in teaching and mentoring client organizations so that internal teams become more mature in portfolio and project management.
